CIVIL SUIT PRECEDENT

Case on Trial at Richfield Involves Questions Never Before Argued in Utah.

(Special to The Herald-Republican.)
Richfield, Feb. 1.—Judge Chidester's court is now occupied with the trial of a case which is likely to establish a precedent in civil suits in this state, in that no other case of record in Utah is just like it. It involves the question of the right of parties to provide against flood waters from a reservoir, in directing said waters away from their lands. The case comes up from Salina and involves something of the history of the subduing of the lands on the west side of the Sevier river.

About twelve years ago a flood occurred during the summer which carried debris over the fields of several Salina farmers, chief among the sufferers being James S. Jensen, then bishop of Salina, and E. W. Crane, one of the present county commissioners. They had fields of ripened grain ready for the harvest when the flood came and destroyed every vestige of grain and covered their fields to a depth of from one to four feet with rocks, soil and driftwood. Steps were immediately taken to prevent recurrence of this by taking a force of men and teams to a point above the highest cultivated land and throwing up an earthen dam to prevent future floods.

The dam which followed this wash has become a great gully from ten to twenty feet in width and averaging about ten feet in depth. The Vermilion Extension canal and the Rocky Ford canal both cross this wash at a distance of half a mile apart. Two years ago another big flood came down the West mountains and the water in great volume swept down the wash. The timbers forming the culvert under the upper end of the Vermilion Extension canal and the Rocky Ford canal both crossed this wash at a distance of half a mile apart.
